Context

Any organization is made by people. The skills of the people can make the difference, especially when it comes to positions of responsibility.

This course addresses the growing need we all have to develop our management skills. In an increasingly changing and competitive environment this need is even greater. These skills are the basic tools to function successfully in the workplace and efficiently perform the management function.

Management skills are not immutable. They can be improved with the necessary will and the appropriate methodology. They will impact, no doubt, professional performance and personal satisfaction.

Traditional training programs are mainly focused on transmitting knowledge, but only tangentially affect the development of personal skills that are needed to function professionally. The result is that these skills are often developed in a purely intuitive fashion, following a hard trial and error.

The objective of this course is to provide students with the knowledge of the main techniques that can lead to the acquisition of some important management skills. It will draw on a very practical methodology that uses cutting-edge teaching strategies for developing managerial skills in a comprehensive manner so that students eventually end up dominating and using these tools, and also improve their mastery of the English language. These skills, although for didactic reasons are studied in isolation, in reality they are integrated, interrelated and act together (for example, communication is key to influencing others during negotiations), and require continuous learning and practice.

OBJECTIVES

- Present a holistic approach to business management and leadership skills
- Raise awareness among participants that management skills can be enhanced and improved.
- Analyze the different skills key to good business management
